1. Introduction

Since 2009, the Reincorporation and Normalization Agency (ARN), formerly known as the Colombian Agency for the Reintegration of Armed People and Groups - ACR, has organized six South-South technical cooperation tours. Such tours have been spaces for the exchange of knowledge in Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration processes (DDR), peace-building and reconciliation, as well as for the identification of good practices and success stories .

Along with the implementation of regulations for the Final Agreement for the Termination of the Conflict signed between the National Government and guerrilla group Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - Army of the People (FARC-EP), and while developing the early reincorporation phase (complete well-being, academic training, training for work, cultural initiatives and community actions) of the members of that organization, the VI South-South Technical Cooperation Tour was held between October 23rd and 27th in the city of Bogota. On this occasion, the purpose was to learn about both national and international experiences and perspectives around three theme axes related to reincorporation: the transition into political participation, community approach and partnerships as a platform for the economic reintegration of former combatants. Researchers, experts, facilitators and direct parties (as former members of the FARC-EP, some of them currently engaged with the Common Revolutionary Alternative Force, a political organization constituted under the Agreement) participated in the panels, forums and workshops carried out within the framework of the Tour.

Thus, during the first day of activities, specific international cases and experiences were presented within three theme axes of the tour. In the different parts of the agenda, assistants could listen to the expositions and opinions of national and international experts related to processes of political participation, solidary economy and community approach that have taken place in

1. The tours referred to are the following:

" Peace-building in Colombia: An Experience to Share", Caribbean Coast, 2009

"Consolidation of Peace in Colombia: An Integrated Experience in DDR and Development", Valle del Cauca, 2010

"From Reintegration towards Reconciliation: DDR for Peace-Building", Meta, 2012

"Reintegration in Colombia: 10 Years Building Peace", Valle del Cauca, 2013

"Reintegration: Reconciliation and Development from the Territories", Coffee Region, 2015

Colombia and in countries such as South Africa, United Kingdom, Sierra Leone, Northern Ireland, El Salvador, Ecuador, Spain, Canada, Italy, Argentina, Philippines, Lebanon, Mexico and Venezuela.

The second day of the tour was dedicated to the review of the experience Colombia has accumulated over the years in successive reintegration and reincorporation processes in the implementation of public policies that have taken into account elements of promotion of partnerships and the community approach. The review of these elements is important because it establishes a precedent and point of reference to face the challenges and take advantage of the current opportunities.

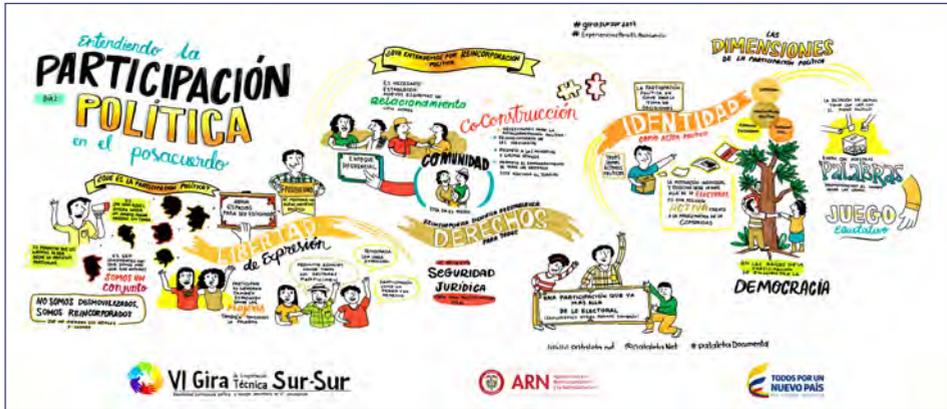

Workshops and panels that address more specific aspects occupied the third day of the Tour. These methodologies allowed starting the dialogue about: the role of women in scenarios of the social change posed by the post-agreement period; the importance of political inclusion; the quality of the electoral system to promote local political participation; and the relationship between solidary economy organizations, productive links and inclusion in national and international markets.

The "World Cafe" methodology was also used in the tour in order to encourage a dialogue among attendees, which enabled a synthesis of the lessons learned and the possibility of applying it to specific contexts. For this purpose, three questions arose: What lessons did we learn from the meeting held in the framework of the tour? How can we materialize these lessons for the future? What should we take into account to carry out this materialization?

According to the Tour's theme agenda, this document is structured in four sections. The first three address the three theme axes of the VI Tour, namely political participation, community approach and partnerships, all of them within the framework of the post-agreement period with the FARC-EP. Finally, some reflections on each of them are offered.

The appendixes contain the agenda of the VI Tour and the list of national and foreign guests who participated in the conferences, panels and workshops.

2. Reincorporation and Political Participation

One of the main elements of any process of terminating an armed conflict through negotiation is the cessation of violent actions in order to achieve political goals and its replacement by political activities within the framework of the constitutional order, democracy and the rule of law.

There is no universal formula: the manner and conditions through which people move from armed action to political participation vary on a case-by-case basis. However, some key factors can be identified, which were pointed out during panel Presentation of International Cases of Political Participation, within the framework of the VI Tour:

- An effective DDR process (Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration) that allows the organization to transform and adapt for political competition not only in short but also in the medium and long-term (Abousleiman, 2017).
- The application of an adequate transitional justice system that harmonizes the connection between restorative and retributive justice before the communities (Bangura, 2017).
- The design of political and social consensuses that provide legitimacy to the agreements and understandings that regulate the transition into political life. This process, by definition, is often much more complex than what the parties envisioned, as the experience of Northern Ireland has shown (Walsh, 2017).

Also, the above assumes the responsible fulfillment of the rules of the democratic game by all the parties that participate in the political activity.

The confluence of the enunciated factors is essential for the political reincorporation in order to contribute to the strengthening of the democratic system, understood as the one in which:

"The majority of those who make the collective decisions of power (are) selected through clean, honest and periodic elections, in which all the candidates compete freely for votes and in which virtually all the adult population has the right to vote (...) (something that) also implies the existence of civil and political freedoms, such as expressing, publishing, meeting and organizing everything that is necessary for political debate and the conduct of electoral campaigns "(Huntington, 1991, p.20).

On the other hand, in the context of a democratic system, political participation includes all those actions of citizens, in any dimension or level of the political system, that seek to support or influence government action, public policy processes or, in the end, the systematic patterns of the behavior of a society (Milbrath & Goel , 1977, Kaase & Marsh , 1979 and Norris , 2001, cited by Van Deth , 2001, pp. 4-5). In that sense, reincorporation and political participation include both electoral competition and civic involvement through mechanisms and scenarios that go beyond the electoral aspect.

The process of transit towards political participation requires great responsibility by all the parties involved. Groups that withdraw from the armed route, such as the FARC-EP, should generate trust with society by adhering to the principles, values and rules of democracy. However, they must also have the willingness and commitment to resolve different challenges that naturally arise as a result of the transition from armed action to political action by the organization and its members, such as:

- Identity crisis, related on the one hand with the access to spaces for exercising citizenship (in terms of each), and on the other, with their new nature and the new logic of functioning and relating both internally and with other parties (in organizational terms).

- Leadership crisis, derived from the transformation of the organization, its restructuring as a political organization, and as a result of its first experiences in the electoral competition.

- Reincorporation Process crisis, due to the inertia that it must overcome, the difficulties in materializing the commitments acquired by the parties, among others. Without trust, willingness and commitment, the success of reincorporation and the participation of the organization as a political party are at risk.

2.1. Electoral participation

Electoral competition is essential for democracy and although values could be added to the concept, the sine qua non conditions are: elections, openness, freedom and fair play (Huntington, 1991, p.22). It is understood as such because political participation is configured as a competition for the exercise of power in a formal framework established by the laws and the Constitution, which serve as a basis for the principles of democracy in the country.

Through electoral competition, the politically reintegrated organization seeks to obtain the support of increasingly larger groups of citizens to promote its agenda and its political program, with the expectation of occupying the positions of citizen representation and government in the different levels of the State as a result of the electoral processes.

Nevertheless, as explained in Panel "Participation in the Electoral System and Political Inclusion", some internal and contextual factors that make an adequate electoral political participation possible can be identified.

Regarding the internal factors of the organization, the following should be noted:

- The ability to transform internally and move from the logic of illegal armed groups to the logic of political organizations.
- The ability to establish constructive relations with citizens, other political parties and different social and economic parties.

- The ability of leaders to revalidate themselves before other members, no longer regarding subordination and hierarchy, but as part of a collective and more horizontal project that, by its very nature, requires new lines of reasoning.
- The ability to maintain its internal cohesion, while adapting its discourse and strategies of action, according to the nature of electoral competition.
- The ability to stick to the game rules and generate credibility and trust with citizens.

Regarding context factors, which in reality are not only related with the political organization that results from the political Reincorporation Process, but also with all the political parties and movements that operate in a democracy, the following stand out:

- The existence of clear, fair and stable electoral institutions and rules that guarantee equal conditions for electoral competition, transparency in the financing of political activity and accountability to citizens.
- The possibility of participating in public deliberation through equitable access to the media.
- The existence of security guarantees (in multiple dimensions) for the exercise of politics, within the framework of pluralism proper to democracy, and not only for those who submit their name to public scrutiny but for the citizens who exercise their political rights, free of coercion and manipulation.
- Sufficient access and reasonable resources to meet the costs of the electoral political activity, which must come from legal sources and be subject to the control of both the electoral authorities and citizenry as a whole.

When illegal armed groups transition into participation in politics, one of the spaces in which this takes place is, precisely, the electoral one. Their goal, in that scenario, is to win the elections. As with any political party or movement, the results obtained in the elections generate rights, but also the duty to exercise the investiture that is accessed concerning the common good and by the Constitution and laws.

2.2 Beyond the electoral aspect

There is no single way of "doing politics". Political participation can be approached from different dimensions. Thus, although the creation of a new party that enters the electoral competition within the process of political reincorporation is important, the political exercise is not limited only to this institution. In the presentation International Cases in Political Participation, panelists agreed on the fact that political exercise transcends the elections and should be understood as a civic task that is a characteristic of solid democracies.

There are several ways to participate in politics. By the way, it is interesting to recall an analogy proposed by the participants of one of the groups at worktable Understanding the Political Participation of Former Combatants in the Post-Agreement Period. According to this analogy, political participation is like a tree whose trunk is made up by democratic freedoms, while the branches reflect the different forms of exercise of citizenship, one of which is electoral participation. However, it is not the only one.

The Political Constitution of 1991 defines in Article 40 the scope of the political rights of all Colombians. However, beyond this "electoral political citizenship", political reincorporation must also aim at other forms of civic involvement that, in response to citizens' interests, expectations and demands, assume different structures in the face of public affairs.

This represents a challenge for the organization that moves from armed action to political activity, but also means an opportunity. In this sense, along with electoral participation, the new political organization can promote and participate in different manifestations of citizenship exercise, such as:

- Volunteering: the donation of time and personal effort to meet the immediate needs of the community.
- Activism: the use of various modes of persuasion (petitions, marches, letter writing, advertising campaigns) to convince decision makers (public or private) to guide their decisions for the benefit of the community.
- Collective action: work with the various groups of a community, taking advantage of existing assets to solve problems and improve the environment.
- Civic Association: engagement with community organizations that develop social networks and strengthen the social capital that is necessary to sustain collective initiatives and community building efforts.

On the horizon, political reincorporation is also citizen reincorporation, and this is particularly important at the local level, where it can contribute to the sustainability of political organization and for strengthening the social capital that has been eroded by violence. At the same time, the political activity beyond the electoral aspect allows to build alliances and synergies with other parties, and ease the insertion of the organization and its members individually considered into public and citizen scenario.

2.3 The role of reconciliation in political reincorporation

Political reincorporation is integrated with other post-agreement processes that include reconciliation. Unlike forgiveness, which is a personal and individual decision of moral content, reconciliation is a social and collective process of political content, involving multiple parties and dimensions, which develops at different speeds in the long term, as society moves along the path of the post-agreement period.

Social reconciliation goes through self-recognition and the recognition of the other one, and is linked to other elements, such as the commitment expressed in the Agreement to provide truth, justice, reparation and non-repetition guarantees, without which there is no possible reconciliation.

Through recognition, it is possible to renew the ties that violence has broken and that have generated fissures in society as a whole. This is the importance of reconciliation for a successful reincorporation and political participation because without it, it is not possible to integrate former combatants into the civil space (life in society in its multiple dimensions). Since in many cases reconciliation processes can contribute to paving the road to political and economic reincorporation, these have a condition of possibility.

Indeed, reconciliation helps to overcome the dialectical logic of armed confrontation under dichotomous logics (friend/enemy) and to reverse the phenomenon of the "political economy of hatred" (Narváez, 2017). Through material and symbolic actions of reparation and change, reconciliation contributes to the restoration of citizenship and the fullness of their political, historical and social subjectivity to all those who, as a result of violence, have been excluded or have excluded themselves from society.

The Voice of Participants

"From the experience of M-19, the intention to carry out peace processes is evident. Although several of these attempts were unsuccessful, there was an understanding that an armed uprising was not the right option" - Antonio Navarro Wolff, national guest, during Discussion Panel "National Experiences of Political Participation", held on Tuesday, October 24th, 2017.

"The implementation process cannot be exclusively in the hands of the State" - Former members of the FARC-EP, during workshop "Reconciliation Initiatives", held on Thursday, October 26, 2017.

"We need to understand that, in order to overcome challenges, we cannot over-size the possibilities that a Reincorporation Process can offer" - Tomás Concha, international guest during Discussion Panel "National Experiences of Political Participation", held on Tuesday, October 24th, 2017.

"The lack of participation of the people is something that affects the parties. We must expand participation, especially to the lower classes" - Diana Viloria, a former member of the FARC-EP, during Discussion Panel "Participation in the Electoral System and Political Inclusion" held on Wednesday, October 25th, 2017.

"Essentially, democratic freedoms are those that harbor political participation. Electoral and non-electoral aspects are recognized upon it" - former members of the FARC-EP, during the workshop "Understanding the political participation of former combatants during the Post- Agreement Period" (I), held on Tuesday, October 24th, 2017.

"The formal dimensions of political participation must be generated by citizen participation mechanisms" - Former members of the FARC-EP during workshop "Understanding the Political Participation of Former Combatants during the Post- Agreement Period (I)", Tuesday, October 24th, 2017.

"It is also important to recognize that there should be empowerment of citizens. People must build their own initiatives with autonomy" - Former members of the FARC-EP, during workshop "Reconciliation Initiatives" held on Thursday, October 26th, 2017.

"We have to solve the causes that gave origin to the conflict in order to build trust. We must make progress in political inclusion within the responsibility and presence of the State with social investment" - Former members of the FARC-EP, during workshop "Reconciliation Initiatives", held on Thursday, October 26th, 2017.

"The role of people in materializing the learning of the Tour is summarized in need of multiplying knowledge, reflections, and experiences. This new knowledge should be coupled with the practical knowledge of the communities on the territory in order to make it more effective" - Former members of the FARC-EP, during workshop "Reconciliation Initiatives", held on Thursday, October 26th, 2017.

3. Community Approach

Another element that is a main characteristic of a post-agreement period is community approach. As indicated by Diosita Andot (2017), Executive Director of the Presidential Office of the Peace Process in the Philippines and speaker of the Philippine experience, its importance lies on the fact that such approach is created from the social cohesion between different sectors around the generation of trust. In addition, it is based on the principles of democratic freedoms such as political participation, religious beliefs, forms of government, among others, and that is part of a normalization process, where communities receive support to obtain better family and productive opportunities, and to support the nation-building process.

In a DDR process, the community approach contributes to the generation of trust, to the strengthening of social capital in the communities and the integration of former combatants with other social parties. From the perspective of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), this approach is based on an inclusive partnership with communities of stakeholders that recognizes their resilience, capacities and resources (UNHCR, 2007), so that there is a joint work to contribute to the overcoming of the challenges that communities face, without having to depend on external agents to assume these responsibilities (UNHCR, 2008).

Different perspectives on the community approach were addressed in the different forums of the VI Tour. For example:

- Melissa Wainberg (2017), Project Coordinator of the Los Grobo Foundation, points out that the approach is important because it enhances and deepens democracy through the planning of territorial development and the participation of communities. In this regard, it is necessary to strengthen local capacities and stakeholder coordination (local organizations in the public, private and social sectors and social investors) so that the dialogue, design and management of initiatives generate high community impact on the territories.
- In accordance with the above, Chuyi Guibelondo (2017), highlights the need to involve parties such as the media, leaders of social networks, and religious and cultural leaders. This would enable that the contents, activities and results of the actions for peace resonate throughout the country, since "a peace process that has strong public support, is a productive peace process".

By examining the experiences of countries that have conflicts and have transitioned into a post-conflict era -such as those collected during the VI Tour-, key lessons are identified that highlight the importance of the community approach as a way in which communities participate meaningfully and substantially in everything concerning the solution of their problems, and which, in turn, transform them into an engine of change through active leadership (UNHCR, 2013). This approach aims to empower all the parties involved in the process in order to strengthen the dignity of the communities. Therefore, a collective work is presented towards the achievement of its objectives (UNHCR, 2008).

3.1 Reconciliation and strengthening of social capital

According to the manual of the International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (IDEA), reconciliation is defined in two ways. On the one hand, "ideally", where we think about the consolidation of peace, the rupture of violence and the strengthening of institutions, based on the repair of previous damages and the construction of non-violent relations between individuals and communities. On the other hand, reconciliation "in practice", as a complex process involving efforts of all parties of the conflict, such as changes in attitude, behavior and the institutional environment (IDEA, 2003).

An "ideal" reconciliation focuses partially on what Sandra Velosa (2017) discussed: it is necessary to work on minimum points that guarantee life in the territories, as well as to build a concept of reconciliation based on minimum points that depend on the dynamics and complexity of the context. Likewise, it must build a culture of reconciliation and forgiveness, where its processes are based on generating greater trust in the political sector, eliminating violence with the law and promoting a joint effort to solve problems.

Regarding reconciliation "in practice", the Tour provided two international experiences of great relevance. On the one hand, Rwanda, whose levels of the genocide between Hutus and Tutsis in 1994 generated a "trauma", as Ndeye Sow (2017) from International Alert, called it, has made efforts to recover economically and rebuild the social capital to through reconciliation. In this sense, joint work has been carried out with former combatants, perpetrators and survivors that aim to reduce the "trauma" that impacts both the generation that experienced the event and the current generation of young people.

On the other hand, in Northern Ireland, the Good Friday Agreement is an example where reconciliation has been the "heart" of the process. According to Duncan Morrow, a professor at the University of Ulster in Ireland, reconciliation, without a sustained effort, full of Trials and mistakes, would not have been possible to build peace through economic recovery and social integration of excluded groups, especially women's groups, youth and local communities (Morrow , 2017).

According to the workshops, reconciliation is developed with the construction of trust in the individual, family and territorial levels, characterized by the recognition of the other, the dialogue, the truth, the reparation and reparation to the victims among the parties involved in the conflict.

3.2. A shared vision of the future

In addition to developing a reconciliation process and strengthening social capital, the communities most affected by conflict face various problems due to its complexity, which must be addressed jointly, starting with the dialogue and the participation of multiple stakeholders, being among them, civil society organizations, the State and the private sector. Having multiple parties implies different positions on the solution of the problems in the territories. Nevertheless, through dialogue, shared visions can be integrated so there is planning through a diagnosis of the territory, a process of community organization and the completion of a project carried out within an implementation action plan.

The community has an important role in the development of the initiative, including the stage of diagnosis, implementation and evaluation. However, the community approach does not imply that the communities of the territory have to confront the problems of their region by themselves: on the contrary, other parties of the local, regional and national order are key in their solution.

According to Melissa Wainberg (2017), these initiatives and coordination must be action-oriented, that is, the implementation of what has been built from a common goal stated by the parties involved, thereby transcending stages of diagnosis and formulation, is needed. Likewise, for the process to be effective and pertinent in achieving the objectives defined, it is important to establish the contributions of the participants and design a clear monitoring plan. Otherwise, it will be difficult to ensure the sustainability of the actions implemented and the confidence reached between the parties may become weak. A simple example of a common purpose can be proposed from the general point of view (the development of the territory) to a particular one (the construction of a road), where stakeholders converge to identify the needs and challenges and plan a sustainable program that benefits the community to all the interested parties.

The above assumes:

- Understanding that communities have complex dynamics and particularities that deserve holistic attention.
- Recognizing the divergence in the interests of the sectors involved.
- Identifying the common purposes to resolve and coordinate realistically the divergent interests that may exist between the parties.

In the light of the collective reflection resulting from the workshops developed during the VI Tour, it is also important to point out other elements of importance to make effective the community approach in the context of the post-agreement period, such as:

- The participatory planning of the territory where the inclusion of the various parts is the core pillar and the needs and capabilities of each territory are contemplated.
- The effective recognition of the non - repetition principle with the purpose of breaking the cycle of violence and solving the problems of land distribution and political participation.
- Confronting institutional challenges such as the provision of public goods, and meeting basic needs such as security, so that there are guarantees of participation in the communities and the generation of educational spaces for coexistence and reconciliation.

These assumptions have been incorporated successfully in experiences like the initiative "The Future is on the Hill"², whose feasibility, according to Wainberg (2017), is to generate solutions from the knowledge of the communities in an endogenous process to manage a territorial portfolio where more than 150 initiatives seek to impact and achieve development in a given region. In this way, strategies are proposed to promote the territorial capacities that work based on the cultures in search of changes that are sustainable and significant from the collective perspective. On the other hand, work must be done so that the initiatives that are developed transcend mere economic subsistence alternatives, and on the contrary, are focused on achieving individual progress that allows achieving a better standard of living.

The strategy above described is based on the research of Stanford University (California, United States) on Collective Impact, conducted by John Kania and Mark Kramer, published in the magazine "Stanford Social Society Innovation Review" (Kania & Kramer, 2011), which identified different types of collaborations³ to solve social problems. In particular, "The Future is on the Hill" is part of the initiatives of collective impact, which are long - term commitments set by parties representing different sectors and seek to solve a specific problem or around a common agenda or purpose.

Now, within the results shown by the investigation, five conditions that match the effectiveness of a collective impact strategy are identified:

- Establishment of a common agenda or a joint vision around the understanding of the problem.
- Shared measurement systems to analyze the data collected and measure permanent results based on indicators at the community level in all the organizations that are part of the process.

2. This initiative seeks to promote the territorial and sustainable development of the Gran Chaco region, which includes the provinces of Chaco, Formosa, Salta, Jujuy, Santiago del Estero and Tucumán located in Argentina, Paraguay, Peru and Bolivia. This region is the second most wooded area in Latin America after the Amazon. This was one of the experiences presented during the VI Tour.

3. The types of collaboration identified are: i) Donor collaborations; ii) Public-private partnerships; iii) Initiatives of multiple interest groups; and vi) Social sector networks.

- Activities of mutual reinforcement through the coordination of the efforts within an action plan that guides the operations and support to the same ones by the parties involved.
- Continuous communication among the parties.
- Central organizations that constitute an axis of support for the joint action.

Another enriching experience regarding community approach has been developed in the Philippines⁴ where, according to Diosita Andot (2017), it has been demonstrated that a peace agreement does not have effect without the participation of the community and the understanding of the particular impacts on each territory. The design of projects in the territories must consider different stages of implementation:

- First, the community works as long as it is willing to do so. It does not need immediate training and interventions are required.
- Second, the members of the community are free to associate by their own initiative.
- Third, community members can participate in the design of a plan (planning).
- Fourth, implementation of the proposed plan.
- Fifth, management of conflicts that arise in the previous stages.
- Sixth, empowerment of the community and ability to present their project to other communities

According to Andot, generally, a community needs six or seven years to complete this cycle. The required institutional services are provided according to the stage in which the implementation of the project is as well as the progress of the communities.

4. The Global Agreement on Bangsamoro (Comprehensive Agreement on Bangsamoro, CAB) was signed on March 27, 2014, and allowed to conclude 17 years of negotiations and more than four decades of armed conflict in Mindanao (Fisas , 2015).

That said, this experience can guide the Colombian case towards building participatory spaces in the communities. However, the context and particularities of the territories must be taken into account, as well as their capacities and strengths within the process of normalization and incorporation of former combatants into their daily lives. For this reason, it is necessary to provide opportunities for social cohesion as pedagogical and participatory spaces for the construction of legitimacy and trust.

3.3 Women and young people as agents of change in post-agreement scenarios

The Final Agreement signed for the Ending of the Conflict between the National Government and the FARC-EP can become a source of opportunity to promote the political, economic, social and cultural inclusion of women. According to Ndeye Sow (2017), the African countries that have reached the highest levels of female representation in political and social life have done so after going through conflict and post-conflict processes.

From the United Nations Organization for Gender Equality and the Empowerment of Women (UN Women), Carolina Tejada (2017), advisor for Gender Affairs, points out that, to women, the construction of a framework of their own rights has been a path that, little by little, has been opened in successful post-agreement scenarios. Regarding political participation, the Security Council of the United Nations issued the Resolution 1325 of 2000, as an instrument that results in women not being approached only as victims, but as an essential part in the resolution of conflicts and the building of social capital.

In a global study conducted by the University Institute of Geneva (IUG) between 2011 and 2015 on the implementation of the above mentioned resolution, in 40 peace processes since the end of the Cold War, it was found that when women's participation was broad and that negotiations almost always ended with an agreement (IUG, 2015). Also, a positive correlation was identified between the influence of women in the negotiation processes and a greater likelihood that the agreements would be implemented (UN Women 2015).

In other words, the participation of women in negotiations allows 35% more probability that the peace accords will last more than 15 years, therefore, the greater the gender equality, governments tend to resort less to the use of force (UN, 2015). In other words, the participation of women in peace processes is an enabler of their consolidation. Hence, the importance of maintaining and strengthening their presence in peace-building efforts in Colombia.

One of the main challenges for women to reach their full potential as agents of change is the transformation of institutions, because they are a reflection of and, in some cases, expand the stereotypes and pre-existing barriers in society. The institutional process may present challenges, due to the lack of knowledge of gender issues that are reflected in the organizations. In this regard, the accompaniment of former combatant women must be integral, in a process that recognizes the contextual and circumstantial differences of the experiences they had in the armed struggle.

That said, the conflict, according to Sow (2017), can be seen as an opportunity to visualize gender inequality and create opportunities for women so that they can be included, especially in policy and economic contexts. However, to be successful in this purpose, it is necessary to have a specific budget, which means a challenge for governments. In such challenges, international cooperation agencies can be engaged as suppliers of different inputs, both of technical and economic nature.

According to Otto Argueta (2017), whose community experience in working with young people has focused on work in gangs in Central America, it is important that policies aimed at young people consider their inclination to remain in a group and, in this context, generate ties of solidarity, brotherhood and build symbols about a shared future. The work of organizations such as Interpeace in Honduras and Guatemala has taken advantage of this condition in dealing with young people, in such a way that individual capacities are not strengthened but, instead of that and above all, the collective ones are, and work is done to transform the element of violence present in gangs of young people, and not to question their collective identity. Thus, what must be extracted from the environment of young people are violent behaviors, but not the meaning of the community already formed.

The Voice of Participants

"Community processes are not carried out successfully when the State, as a centralized entity, handles the entire process of reconciliation. We must take into account the territories to rebuild the economy and the social fabric, which are two of the most important problems after the trauma" - Ndeye Sow, international guest, during forum "Presentation of international cases in community approach", held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017.

"Strategies that seek to strengthen local capacities that work from the cultures and base changes that are sustainable and meaningful in the territories are proposed. To do this, the entire region requires coordination and complex processes to think about alternatives together with the communities: that is the greatest effort, collective construction. On the other hand, we must work to ensure that these initiatives are not alternative economic alternatives, but that they generate a better quality of life" - Melissa Wainberg, international guest, during Forum "Presentation of international cases in community approach", held on Monday October 23rd, 2017.

"There are two approaches: One is the recognition of leadership in local systems to connect informal, regional and traditional leadership systems around the construction of better living conditions and participation. Moreover, on the other hand, the promotion of non-formal processes that involve the government and the communities to ensure that the voices of the people are heard." - Romina Sta. Clara, international guest, during forum "Presentation of international cases in community approach", held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017.

"All the participants of the FARC are responsible for helping to heal wounds of the conflict. They must go through the process of Truth, Justice, Repair and Guarantees. The public force, political parties, third parties and others involved in the process must also participate in this process. The FARC as an insurgent group and as a political party have fragile relations with some communities: there is a challenge to improve them. In a concrete way, this is about developing a community process where it is possible to strengthen the trust and ties with the community." - Luis Celis, during discussion panel "National experiences on community approach", held on Tuesday, October 24th, 2017.

"A pedagogy must be carried out since the strengths and potential of people in the communities are not known and they do not have a social inclusion. In this sense, the purpose is the inclusion and regeneration of the social fabric" - Intervention of former members of the FARC-EP during the workshop "Relevance of the community approach (I)" held on Tuesday, October 24, 2017.

"We must take into account the people of the municipalities in order to be able to promote projects tied to the development plans of the municipalities and build the State from the beginning with the existing organizations, by strengthening the dialogue between the community and institutions so that the projects are self-sustaining and respond to the interests of the same communities." - Intervention of former members of the FARC-EP during discussion panel "Sustainability and territorial coordination (I)", held on Thursday, October 26th, 2017.

4. Partnerships during the post-agreement period

The principles and values of modern cooperative organizations have their roots in the conformation of the Rochdale Equitable Pioneers Society in 1844 by a group of 28 weavers and skilled workers in other offices, with the aim of selling consumer items that they could not otherwise access (Institute of Political Science, 2016).

The experts, including several of those who participated in this segment of the Tour, agree that, as indicated by the International Cooperative Organization Alliance, the cooperative organization "is an autonomous association of people who have joined voluntarily to meet their needs and common economic, social and cultural aspirations through a jointly owned and democratically controlled company" (ACI, n.d), which is governed by the values of "mutual aid, responsibility, democracy, equality, equity and solidarity" (ACI, n.d), as well as the following seven principles (ACI, n.d):

- Voluntary and open membership. Cooperative organizations are voluntary organizations, open to all persons capable of using their services and willing to accept the responsibilities of being a member, without social, racial, political, religious or gender discrimination.
- Democratic control of the members. Cooperative organizations are democratic organizations controlled by their members, which actively participate in the definition of policies and decision-making. People elected representatives are responsible to the partners. All the cooperative organizations are organized democratically. However, at a base level, members have the right to vote in an equal way (one member, one vote), while in those of other levels (federations, confederations) this may vary.

- Economic participation of the members. The members contribute equally and democratically control the capital of the cooperative organization. At least, part of that capital is common property. They usually receive limited compensation, if any, on the subscribed capital as a condition of membership. Members allocate surpluses for any or all of the following three purposes: i) the development of the average cooperative through the possible creation of reserves which at least would be indivisible; ii) benefiting the partners in proportion to their operations with the cooperative organization; and iii) supporting other activities approved with the partners.
- Autonomy and independence. Cooperative organizations are autonomous organizations managed by their partners. If they enter into agreements with other organizations, including the Government, or if they obtain capital from external sources, they do so in terms that, on the one hand, they ensure democratic control by their partners and, on the other hand, they maintain their cooperative autonomy.
- Education, training and information. Cooperative organizations provide education and training to their members, elected representatives, managers and employees so they can contribute effectively to develop the organization. In addition, they inform the general public (especially young people and opinion leaders on the nature and the benefits of cooperation.
- Cooperation between cooperative organizations. Cooperative organizations serve their members more effectively and strengthen the cooperative movement by working together through local, national, regional and international structures.
- Commitment to the community. Cooperative organizations work for the sustainable development of their communities through policies approved by their partners.

Based on the above elements, the opportunities that partnerships and cooperative organizations provide to the economic reincorporation of former combatants are explained below.

4.1. Solidary economy: an alternative for economic and social development

With the elements of analysis presented in the previous paragraphs, it can be asserted that the solidary economy is a tool that offers opportunities for sustained and inclusive growth to both individual and community levels, from values of transparency, democracy, shared responsibility and collaboration. Indeed, solidary economy is an alternative for progress, thanks to its capacity to transform the territories economically, socially and culturally. In this regard, the following is proposed:

"The construction of a solidary economy is one of these alternative strategies, which takes advantage of the changes in the relations of production and labor generated by major capital, to launch and promote the foundations of new ways of organizing production and exchanges, on the basis of a logic very different from that which prevails in a typical capitalist market "(Singer, 2002, page 138).

The solidary model is based on values and principles focused on people and not on benefits, but this does not exclude the generation of surpluses that provide associates with the possibility of improving their quality of life. The preceding depends mainly on the promotion of a business vision and the effective administration of financial resources, knowledge, work capacities and self-management. Therefore, it is necessary for economic solidary organizations to adopt practices based on efficacy, efficiency and cost-benefit analysis, and to incorporate indicators regarding coexistence, participation, human development and education.

The common factor of a solidary economy organization is its collective equity. Such equity, as referred by Phillips (2017) during her intervention in the panel on International Cases of Partnerships in the framework of the VI Tour, has a management with democratic control of decisions, where the role that each partner plays does not depend of the capital invested: on the contrary, all members have equal rights and duties. This management model is developed within the framework of a market economy, with autonomy and independence from government institutions.

Hence, the establishment of any solidary economy organization is voluntary and requires the generation of confidence among the associates and with the other parties that live in the territory. The partnership model requires the responsibility of the communities, recognizing the importance of self - sufficiency and autonomy, to decouple them from the dependence on the State. The benefits are distributed collectively, thereby generating a process of economic democratization. Therefore, the following is proposed:

"As they socially expand access to capital, as long as they allow many to participate in the management of companies, and as long as they generate stable occupations that do not dependent on capital, they create conditions for democratic expansion, not only in the specific economic sphere, but more generally, in all matters of a social nature and in which the state intervenes [...] solidary economy can be defined as the set of activities that contribute to the democratization of the economy based on the commitments assumed by citizens" (Laville, 2002, page 136).

On the other hand, there are two types of solidary organizations: cooperative organizations of social initiative and mutual associations. The first is associative companies in which members are simultaneously contributors and managers of the company, which is created with the purpose of jointly and efficiently producing or distributing goods or services to satisfy the needs of their associates and the community in general. On the other hand, mutual associations are organizations set up to encourage reciprocal aid among their members, meeting their needs through the provision of services that contribute to the improvement of their quality of life (Special Administrative Unit of Solidary Organizations, 2017).

In either case, the scheme consists in encouraging producers and communities to undertake economies of scale and efficiently access markets to meet their needs. The solidary economy is an opportunity for producers to become part of chains, generate value and access to markets, improve their productivity levels, progress in competitiveness and access to the financial system.

4.2 Partnerships and cooperative organizations: the key to the Reincorporation Process

Solidary organizations are an important instrument in the process of effective reincorporation into civil, economic and political life since they can mobilize the different parties towards a shared commitment around expectations and immediate needs of economic improvement and material well-being. Thus, both the communities affected by the conflict and the groups that participate in the process of integral reincorporation work together to improve the economic conditions of their families and to transform the productive structure of their regions.

The above provides valuable elements for a successful Reincorporation Process. This may create one of the individual advantages over reincorporation and create an incentive for collective reincorporation with associative forms. Partnerships promote the generation of value chains and the expansion of economic activity with local productive vocations, with better possibilities of being sustainable over time and generating social progress on a larger scale.

However, as in any business plan, the first step must consider the planning of the project. This must arise from the interest to transform the social and economic conditions of the regions, deploying their efforts around the resolution of the problems that affect the community the most.

To identify and profile these initiatives, it is crucial to involve the parties present in the territory, create a shared vision that considers their interests, and progress in the planning, structuring and implementation of projects, thereby offering permanently complete information to all the interested parties on the progress of the process.

The formulated work should be projected in the medium and long term and, as mentioned before, be related to the potential of the territory. Likewise, it is essential to identify market opportunities and develop capacities according to the different resources that the region offers. In that order, they should develop diagnoses and design strategic plans that include proposals for productive diversification that are related to the value chain, taking into account the generation of added value and a competitive cost structure.

Through partnerships and cooperative organizations, people who have not been integrated into the circuits of production and consumption, find a path for their productive and labor inclusion and tools for their development. The process offers each partner a different path to assisting to improve their quality of life, while moving forward towards higher levels of formality and efficiency.

4.3 State, solidary companies and communities: main challenges and opportunities

The creation and sustainment of cooperative organizations and solidary associations face challenges that are mainly related to the lack of a culture of partnerships and the absence of policy instruments that are true incentives for the conformation and consolidation of this type of organizations. Overcoming these challenges is a key element to promote social, economic and political integration, and the promotion of productive activities that generate social progress in the medium and long term, something that is essential for rural development, overcoming poverty and closing gaps.

For this reason, it is essential to ensure the commitment of the different parties present in the territory, in the promotion of an entrepreneurial culture based on Partnerships, aimed at launching projects capable of generating income required for the satisfaction of needs of the communities.

In this purpose, it is necessary to clarify the role of those who intervene in the process: State institutions, companies and communities, in each of the phases of the associative project management. Following are some reflections aimed at strengthening the solidary model, and making its contribution to integral reintegration into rurality viable:

4.3.1 The role of the State as a promoter of the solidary scheme

The State must be able to assure a set of minimum conditions for productive development, and, for that purpose, it must promote and protect the solidary economy. In this sense, it is necessary to have a public policy of Partnerships and strengthen government entities as promoters of this model. Additionally, there must be regulatory frameworks that offer legal certainty, clear rules of the game and stability, especially about the property rights, since the feasibility of the investment depends on it, even in the partnership model.

As the Colombian expert Santiago Tobón (2017) warned in the panel on National Cases of Partnership Models, public policy should be based on three fundamental components to promote partnerships and support the Reincorporation Process in post-agreement zones:

- Firstly, the support to activities aimed at identifying and qualifying the associative options that are appropriate to meet the needs of the communities, both in productive and social matters.
- Second, the design of technical assistance and financing for structuring and evaluating productive projects to ensure their feasibility and sustainability over time, in order to make opportunities visible, and to identify the obstacles or constraints that the project may face in markets, infrastructure and capabilities of the population.

- And finally, the launch of a set of instruments designed for the execution of projects that include both incentives and direct support. In addition, institutions have the task of strengthening their educational offer.

The preceding is not exempt from the challenge that is implicit in overcoming the widely acknowledged shortcomings regarding coordination among the institutions of the different levels of government, as well as in the horizontal plane. The direct engagement of governorships and mayoralities is essential to move forward in the field of land use planning and the identification of the vocation and productive potential of the regions, which serve as the basis for creating regional plans around the needs and strengths of the territories. The State, at its different levels, is also responsible for ensuring the investment of resources in the provision of public goods and services without which the productive activity cannot be developed.

However, as stated by Orquídea de la Mercedes Chicaiza Noroña of Ecuador, in the panel on Characteristics of Solidary Models, in addition to the criteria the State must comply with, "skills should be strengthened and leaders should be integrally trained in order to know and learn to identify the purposes shared in the framework of a solidary economy project" (Chicaiza, 2017). This way, progress is made in understanding the shared responsibility that must exist in this type of project for its successful implementation and consolidation.

4.3.2 Partnerships, communities and shared vision

It is up to the communities to accept the challenges of the solidary model and overcome the traditional concept that cooperative organizations and associations are tied to a limited amount of financing and profits. As Carlos Acero pointed out in the panel on International Cases of Partnerships of the VI Tour, these productive models are not "poor-for-poor enterprises" (Acero, 2017). On the contrary, national and international experiences provide evidence on the success of the model in terms of production growth, the generation of income, the creation of jobs and commercial insertion in the markets. The above can only be achieved if the members of partnerships understand that this is a model that has long-term feasibility, can generate income and equity for its affiliates, and that must be inserted in the markets, produce results, and consolidate as an organization with business vocation from the beginning.

It is also essential to know and adopt not only the principles and axes of cooperative organizations and partnerships but also to understand how their management and management bodies operate. Therefore, the rules of the game will be sufficiently clear and all members can have access to the information and know the precise terms of their participation.

In order to project the collective effort towards the future and achieve the objectives of the organization based on the consolidation of long-term activities that require continuity and persistence, it is of great importance to understand and accept that associative projects, like any other enterprise, rarely report immediate returns and their benefits occur in the medium term.

Finally, organizations are responsible for the incorporation of planning processes and business management guidelines that provide concrete tools to communities to promote entrepreneurship and productive diversification processes. These will enable taking advantage of the potential of the territories and generate economic, social and environmental stability.

The Voice of Participants

"In spite of the diversity in institutional, territorial, cultural (international) aspects, historical experiences of resolution of conflicts have been shared. All of this allows the construction of a shared vision of the future" - Former members of the FAR C-EP, during activity "World Café", held on Thursday, October 26th, 2017.

"Social Economy represents a great potential to activate processes of local development in rural areas. It also activates industrial areas in decline and rehabilitates degraded urban spaces, promoting economic development, renewing the competitiveness of the territories and facilitating their national and international integration" - Adán Peña, Platform for Economic and Social Innovation - Mexico, during Forum "Presentation of International cases of Partnerships", held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017.

"Solidary economy is known as the economy of human scale since it places people, their families and communities at the center of its objectives and efforts. This is developed through associative practices, solidarity, shared responsibility, mutual assistance, social and demographic property, and respect for work and the human being." - Adán Peña, Platform for Economic and Social Innovation - Mexico, during the Forum "Presentation of International Cases of Partnerships", - held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017.

"Cooperative organizations are companies that promote principles and values and focus on people and not on capital, as is the case of traditional companies " Fernando Bragado, Coopermondo - Italy, during forum "Presentation of International Cases of Partnerships" held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017

"Education is essential but does not refer only to lectures on cooperative or workshops. In this case, practice and experience are unavoidable "Carlos Acero, Confecoop - Colombia, during forum "Presentation of International Cases of Partnerships", held on Monday, October 23rd, 2017.

"It is essential to recognize the role played by the different parties in meetings that promote leadership around the importance of solidary economies" - Israel Silva Guarnizo, Asociación Cooperativas del Huila - Colombia, during Discussion Panel "Solidary organizations as a tool for accessing export markets", held on Wednesday, October 25th, 2017.

"An inclusion policy is needed to build relationships (Law 1014 of entrepreneurship)" Israel Silva Guarnizo, Asociación Cooperativas del Huila - Colombia, during Discussion Panel "Solidary organizations as a tool to access export markets", - held on Wednesday, October 25th, 2017.

5. Final Thoughts

5.1. On political participation

- The essential element that defines the termination of the conflict is the transition from illegal armed action to political participation. The success of this transition depends on several closely related factors: the legitimacy of the agreements reached supported by a broad social and political consensus, the effectiveness of the DDR processes and the proper application of transitional justice. It also depends on contextual factors: electoral rules and institutions, access to media, financing activities and security guarantees for the exercise of political and effective citizenship. And finally, it is also conditioned by internal factors, typical of the organization that makes the transition, which pertain to its ability to adapt, promote new leadership, interact with other parties, inspire trust and generate credibility.
- The reincorporation and political participation, in any case, must be done in the framework of the constitutional order and by the full validity of the Rule of Law enshrined in the Political Constitution, and the laws that apply to all citizens of the country.
- Political participation refers to both electoral participation and to what goes beyond the election. The latter can be understood as civic-responsible involvement, takes various forms and occurs at different levels. This was highlighted by both international and national guests. For example, from the Salvadoran experience, Juan Javier Martínez (of the FMLN) stated "To political participation, activism and local citizen organizations are important" (Martínez, 2017). In any case, and as the participants in the working groups concluded, the electoral political action of the citizen action on the territory must not be disconnected, as these reinforce each other and that reinforcement is one of the success factors of the Reincorporation Process.

- The processes of collective and individual reconciliation are of great importance for the process of political reincorporation. Such reconciliation processes are made up of material facts, on the one hand, and symbolic gestures on the other. Therefore, it is expected that organizations in transition to political activity assume their past responsibilities and commitments to the future. Otherwise, social rejection will continue hindering their political participation.
- Additionally, on this theme axis, in the World Cafe workshop held with the participants in the Tour, some highlights were the importance of the recognition of people and their different contents as a strategy to identify and understand their mentality with the purpose of ending fears and prejudices, facilitate reconciliation and create favorable conditions for the electoral political participation and beyond the elections.

5.2 About the community approach

- In peace-building and the strengthening of social capital in the territories, it is relevant to include the community approach because it provides an opportunity for those who come from an armed organization that transition into civil life. This allows the capacity of the organization to be strengthened regarding its relationship and integration with communities within the framework of democratic institutions, so that different sectors are coordinated and contribute to the processes of truth, justice, reparation and non-repetition.
- Such an approach enables active and significant participation of community members in everything that concerns them, facilitating the establishment of dialogue and synergy with other parties. In this way, it stimulates the generation of endogenous capacities and empowerment, and allows the promotion of projects that respond to the reality of the territories.

- It also provides tools to meet in a special way the expectations of specific population groups that, like women and young people, can not only be in a situation of vulnerability, but can become agents of change in the construction of community ties, the recovery of coexistence and the preservation of the identity of the territories based on particular interests and common objectives.

- On this particular topic, the World Cafe activity highlighted the importance of reviewing historical experiences of conflict resolution, in spite of its diversity in institutional, territorial and cultural aspects. This facilitates and nurtures the construction of a shared vision of the future that is an essential part of the community approach.

5.2 About partnerships and economic reincorporation

- The solidary economy is an alternative to economic and social development that arises from the collective construction and the democratic control of business decisions. It is materialized in organizations such as cooperative organizations and mutual associations, which develop their activities within the framework of a market economy, based on principles of autonomy and mutual commitment. Upon the generation of trust, the scheme encourages producers and communities to undertake projects that generate productive links, promote innovation, create jobs and local economic development.

- Through the promotion of a culture of entrepreneurship, the communities affected by the conflict and the groups that participate in the Reincorporation Process have the potential to find a sustainable economic alternative that generates benefits for all its members. In addition, it contributes to the strengthening of social capital, to the attention of local needs and to the improvement of the living conditions of the members of the community. In the sea of the partnership process, it will be possible to establish production circuits through which jobs are created, individual capacities are potentiated and progress is made in the formalization of sectors that have remained informal.

- The main challenges posed by the partnership model are related to the role that communities, as well as state institutions and the companies themselves, must assume in the consolidation of productive projects that facilitate a process of integral and successful reincorporation. In this sense, the construction of a shared vision around the potential of the solidary economy to generate sustained and inclusive economic growth is essential. This vision must be projected in the long term, because cooperative processes and ventures never generate immediate results.
- During the activity World Cafe, the importance of carrying out an evaluation exercise of the national and international experiences of solidary economy and partnerships was pointed out in order to identify achievements and observe those aspects that can be improved with care. This exercise also leaves as a lesson that economic projects of this nature are an essential part of the peace-building process in the territories affected by the conflict and, in turn, strengthen the Colombian economy and have positive effects on the social progress.

This analytical document includes the results of the VI South-South Technical Cooperation Tour "Partnerships, Political Participation and Community Approach in the Post-Agreement Period". Its main purpose is to provide elements of discussion that enrich the process of political, economic and social reintegration of the members and militants of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - People's Army (FARC-EP). To this purpose, based on the different approaches collected during the days of the Tour, this document presents an analytical report of the theme axes that were worked on. Thus, regarding the axis of political participation, it addresses different considerations on the relevance of effective electoral participation, but also underlines the importance of understanding political reincorporation as a process that goes beyond the electoral aspect and that, therefore, implies different forms of responsible civic involvement. To both, the promotion of successful reconciliation initiatives that are respectful of the reality of the victims is an essential condition. On the other hand, in terms of community approach, this document highlights the need of reinforcing the Reincorporation Process in the territories, as well as the long-term territorial development drivers of trust recovery and social capital generation, emphasizing on the recognition of the multiplicity of the parties involved and adopting different perspectives for women and young people. Finally, when approaching the topic of partnerships, an assessment of the solidary economy is presented as an alternative of productive development for economic reintegration within the framework of market economy, pointing out the importance of state intervention in the creation of favorable conditions to achieve this purpose, and emphasizing on the business vocation of partnership processes so that they result in social progress and improvement of the economic conditions of those who participate in them.
